

Masthead Logo

The Iowa Review

---

Volume 13
Issue 1 Winter

---

Article 6

1982

The Houses

W. S. Merwin

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.uiowa.edu/iowareview>

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

---

Recommended Citation

Merwin, W. S.. "The Houses." The Iowa Review 13.1 (1982): 23-26. Web.
Available at: <https://doi.org/10.17077/0021-065X.2859>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by Iowa Research Online. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Iowa Review by an authorized administrator of Iowa Research Online. For more information, please contact lib-ir@uiowa.edu.

The Houses · W.S. Merwin

Up on the mountain where nobody is looking a man forty years old in a gray felt hat is trying to light a fire in the springtime up on the mountain where nobody except God and the man's son are looking the father in a white shirt is trying to get damp sticks to burn in the spring noon he crumples newspaper from the luggage compartment of the polished black Plymouth parked under the young leaves a few feet away in the overgrown wagon track that he remembers from another year he is thinking of somewhere else as the match flame blows he has somewhere else in mind that nobody knows as the flame climbs into the lines of print and they curl and set out unseen into the sunlight he needs more and more paper and more matches and the wrapping from hot dogs and from buns gray smoke gets away among the slender trees it does not occur to the son to wonder what prompted his father to come up here suddenly this one morning and bring his son though the father looks like a stranger on the mountain breaking sticks and wiping his hands on the paper as he crumples it and blowing into the flames but when his father takes him anywhere they are both strangers and the father has long forgotten that the son is standing there and he is surprised when the smoke blows in his face and he turns and sees parallel with the brim the boy looking at him having been told that he could not help and to wait there and since it is a day without precedents the son hears himself asking the father whether he may please see what is down the wagon track and he surprises himself hearing the father say yes but don't go far and be very careful and come right back so the son turns to his right and steps over the gray stones and leaves his father making a smoky fire on the flat sloping rock and after a few steps the branches close overhead he walks in the green day in the smell of thawed ground and a while further on he comes to a turn to the right and the open light of cleared ground falling away still covered with the dry grass of last year by a dark empty barn he can see light through and before the barn on the left a white house newly painted with wide gray footsteps leading up to the gray floor of the porch where the windows are newly washed and without curtains so that he can look into the empty rooms and see the doors standing open and he can look out through windows on the other side into the sky while the grass new and old stands deep all around the house that is bare in readiness for somebody the wind is louder here than in the woods the grass hissing and the clean panes rattling he looks at rusted handles beside bushes and with that thinks of his father and turns back into the shadowy wagon track and walks slowly tree by tree stone by stone under the green tiers of leaves until he comes to the smell of smoke and then the long pile of stones before the clearing where his father is bending over the fire and turns at the son's voice and calls him a good boy for coming back and asks whether he's hungry and holds out a paper plate they stand in the smoke holding plates while the father asks the blessing and afterwards the son tells him of the white house the new paint the clean windows into empty rooms and sky and nobody in sight but his father says there is no such house along there and he warns the son not to tell stories but to eat and after a moment the son surprises them both by insisting that he has seen it all just as he said and again the father scolds him this time more severely returning from somewhere else to take up his sternness until the son starts to cry and asks him to come and see for himself after they have eaten so when the plates have been burned and the fire put out carefully and the car packed they walk without a word down the wagon track where the light seems to have dimmed as though rain might be on its way and the trees are more remote than the boy had thought but before long they reach the opening where the track turns to the right and there is the glare of the dry grass but no house no barn and the son repeats I saw them but the father says I don't want to hear any more about it in a later year the father takes the boy taller now and used to walking by himself to an old farm in the middle of the state where he busies himself in the small house he has bought while the son having been told that he cannot help walks down the lane past the vacant corn crib and barn past the red shale banks where the lane descends beside unkempt pastures with their springs and snakes into the woods and onto a wooden bridge still on his father's land he watches the dark water flow out from under low branches and the small fish flickering in glass over the black bed and as he turns and climbs the lane on the far side he sees to his right below him on the edge of the stream a low house painted yellow with a wide porch a gun leaning beside the front door and a dog's chain fastened to the right of the steps but no dog visible there appears to be no one in the house and the boy goes on up the lane through the woods and across pastures and coming back sees that nothing has changed the gun still by the door the chain in the same place he watches to see whether anything moves he listens he stares through the trees wondering where the dog is and when someone will come home then he crosses the stream and returns to his father indoors and in the evening he remembers to ask who is living in the yellow house in the woods on the far side of the stream which he had understood was his father's land but his father tells him there is no house there by then they have left the farm and are driving home and the son tells the father of the gun by the door the dog's chain by the front steps and the father says yes that is his land beyond the stream but there is no building and nobody living there the boy stops telling what he has seen and it is a long time before he comes again to walk down the lane to the woods and cross the bridge and see on the far side only trees by the stream then the farm is sold and the woods are cut and the subject never brought up again but long after the father is dead the son remembers the two houses